I have a jquery code as follows:
$(document).ready(function(){ $("td").click(function() { $("td").attr("id", ""); }); }); In case I have a table with a large number of tds (tens of thousands), is it possible that clicking one td causes some issues as it takes a long time to initite a click event? If no, how can I update the DOM without initiating the click event? A: You can try: $(document).ready(function(){ $("td").on('click', function() { $(this).attr("id", ""); $(this).closest("table").find("td").not(this).removeAttr("id"); }); }); Demo: Update There is also $(this).attr("id", "");

This works: Thread thread; thread.start(); thread.join(); This does not work: Thread thread("thread"); thread.start(); thread.join(); (intellij is giving up on the join() with the second one) Am I misunderstanding the way that creating a Thread object works, and it's no longer usable after it is created? I suppose I could put the thread object in a boost::shared_ptr, but I was hoping that a simple passing of a string to the constructor would be equivalent. A: The thread_group class has a constructor that takes the thread function as an argument: thread_group(thread f678ea9f9e
